Annotation: Globalization is something we cannot see. It is a process of interaction between people, companies and governments of different countries. Nowadays, we can feel globalization almost everywhere. People eat American fast food, wear Italian shoes and Mexican dresses, drive Japanese cars and listen to Korean music. In short, globalization is a mixture of cultures, and English is an important part of the globalization process.

Key words: Globalization, english language, cultures, fields, internet, David Graddol, intercultural, communication, world, second language, Mark Warshauer, D. Cristal Globalization of English in every field of knowledge.

John McWhorter claims that English dominates all languages before it. According to scientists, by the beginning of the new millennium, a quarter of the planet will be able to speak English to some degree. English is the language of almost all fields of knowledge and a means of communication between speakers of English and other languages.

"English has become the language of the Internet, increasing its influence with 80% of all information stored in English"

- says David Graddol, linguist and researcher. Perhaps more people speak Chinese, Spanish and Indian, but only English is the language of intercultural communication, and only English is taught by Chinese and Spanish to their children so that they can communicate freely and develop their knowledge. English is naturally the primary language in call centers around the world.

"English has become a second language for all of us"

- says Mark Warshauer, a professor of computer science at the University of California. In some countries, the British have taken over companies as well as the global economy. Some Swedish companies speak English in their workplaces because most of the business and communication on the Internet is done in English.

D. Cristal said that the last quarter of the 20th century was an important period in the emergence of the world language. English and globalization have spread around the world. Crystal notes that a previously overlooked phenomenon is that the number of people who speak English as a foreign language is three times more than the number of people who speak it as their mother tongue.
