Any action, behavior of a person can have different content - legal, political or other, but its moral side, moral essence is evaluated on the same level indicator.

Social etiquette refers to the ethical behaviours of human beings that are morally accepted by society. It is also known as social norms. The alternative names of social etiquette are the social norm, social manner, unwritten social rule. Social etiquette can differ from society to society based on the environment of the community. For example, some etiquettes are admissible in society; however, the same etiquettes are offensive to another society. So, social etiquette gets followed differently in colourful social groups.

There are two main approaches that differ in the interpretation of the concept of social ethics.

-Social ethics as a set of Aristotle's social virtues or as a set of certain requirements imposed on a person as a subject of social relations. This concept of social ethics exists within the concepts of Aristotle and Max Weber. In the modern world, scientists identify such a phenomenon as communitarianism, which is a natural reaction of society to individualistic values that have prevailed for a long time, in which each person individually considers only his own interests to be the priority. Therefore, it is very attractive to understand social morality as a set of certain social virtues.

-Social ethics is a system of certain norms and values designed to regulate the activities of state institutions, individuals and the social system as a whole. Proponents of this concept include philosophers such as John Rawls, Bernard de Mondeville, and others.
